Are we living in a post-factual society where truth is determined by who has the most persuasive arguments? And if so, does that leave open the question of whose side we are on? There is simply no level of incompetence that would be allowed to happen at CNN or Fox without the network/channels losing all their viewers, regardless of the news. These are the types of people for whom even a kindergarten teacher could tell that they are completely naive about what the world is really like. The only intelligence they have is in spotting who will put their spin on a story. On Fox, for example, they are trying to make the Snowden case by making it about the threat of waterboarding. They feel that admitting that torture is wrong and then making an issue out of how this one man, a traitor, has been mistreated is a win-win situation. The other side is out there in the social media trying to make whatever anti-Obama arguments they can. For example, Fox claims that Obama wants to leave office in a year. This is the line they use in their attempt to discredit anyone who actually supports Obama: "Didn't you hear that he wants to leave office in a year? That's not right." For us, it's obviously more complicated than that. We know that there are people who are anti-Obama, but who support him as a leader. We know there are people who support him as a president, but who do not support some of his policies. We know there are people who distrust him, but see him as an effective leader. There are also people who can't stand any politician of any stripe, believing it all to be a bunch of b.s. It's not that we support Bush the way he is, but that he had no choice: It was a war that he was forced to go into. He had to choose between one side or another, because a take-over was on the horizon. That's what he did. We understand that there are good things that both sides do, including the Republicans. We have support for both the Republicans and the Democrats, but the issue isn't so much Obama as a person, but the flaws of the system he has to work within. Another flaw of the system is that right and wrong are seen so much in black and white terms, ignoring that there are so many shades of gray. You'll never see Fox or CNN try to admit that it may be wrong

Efficiency of NHS funding and the health impact of volume and quality initiatives. The NHS is currently undergoing a major reorganisation. One of the aspects being considered is the impact of volume and quality improvements on overall levels of efficiency. This study uses as input data sets for Wales and England with the Health and Social Care Information Centre (HSCIC) on utilisation and outcomes. We estimate an expanded demand measure for Wales taking into account the inclusion of planned activities based on priorities in the recently published NHS Plan. In addition we develop a measure of efficiency based on five different cost-conversion-ratios (CCR). Our results show that while quality initiatives are more efficient (CCR >1.00), and thus desirable, they do not improve levels of efficiency as much as volume initiatives which in turn drive efficiency up with a CCR >1.20. This is probably because of changes in the structure of services and the availability of resources in deprived areas. Q: What's the negative connotation in the phrase "say no to that"?
