Kinect Powerpoint Mapper is an intuitive, easy-to-use software program that lets users direct and control the slide transitions and autoplay using only their hand, wrist, forearm and a simple gesture. This is something users can easily do with little training because of the nature of the interface. Kinect Powerpoint Mapper does not rely on pre-defined gestures. Instead, it uses machine learning to identify the initial and final positions of the hand and wrist as well as the movement of the hand and wrist and then generates a sequence of powerpoint slide transitions. The slides will automatically advance one at a time in the specified sequence. Users can also use the mouse to control where and how to navigate to the next and previous slides in a powerpoint. Additionally, Kinect Powerpoint Mapper gives the user full control over the speed of the presentation with only their hand, wrist and forearm. Kinect Powerpoint Mapper is free to use in a personal, non-commercial setting. The downside of Kinect Powerpoint Mapper is that it does not work with all powerpoints. It does not work with powerpoints that contain text or background images. Instead, it works best with non-interactive powerpoints. Kinect Powerpoint Mapper consists of three main components. First, there is the standard PowerPoint interface for users to move to next slide, go back to previous slide and so on. Second, there is the tool for the user to make a gesture. Third, there is the code base to take the gestures and translate them into key impulses to drive the powerpoint transitions. A: For Mac OS X users, I'd recommend using It's not exactly what you want (Kinect specific) but it's free, has been around for a while and can recognize the gestures you want. In the past, battery powered electric vehicles have depended on a heavy duty battery pack to power vehicle electric motors. Usually the vehicle battery pack consisted of a bank of battery cells in parallel connected to a voltage regulator. A typical voltage regulator consists of a coil and a switching transistor for shunting high voltage from the battery bank to ground. A battery cell voltage is usually approximately 2.6 volts. The switching transistor may have a high current rating for high battery pack voltages, say 25 volts. The switching transistor typically has an on resistance of about 2 milliohms
