I'm thinking of this book in terms of a different kind of bird this morning, though. Instead of a sparrow, I'm thinking of a hawk and the storm cloud that hangs low and ominous over the field this morning. It's a storm cloud the likes of which hasn't been seen in the area since 2006. New season means new storm clouds, right? I can't remember when I last heard the creaking of the old buggy as I headed down to Holly Springs. (That's as good a definition of Holly Springs as any.) It was back in 1977, the first time that I'd been to the home of the Mayflower Pilgrims. I was with a group of adventurers who'd been driving down for the weekend to hike, sketch, and - yes - ride. We had our wagons with us and set out to explore the old highway and the new parkway that had just been constructed, which has since been turned into a scenic byway. We were headed for a private campground, where we'd spend the night in the fancy houses that have been turned into overnight accommodations. A pretty simple and innocent outing in 1977, as we all should have known that it was hot and the bugs were bad. And mosquitoes. There were mosquitoes everywhere that August. They would bite you as soon as you walked up to a fence, and since most of the houses had fences around them, a much needed breeze was constantly blowing off the lake. It was a hot, sweaty drive and I'd been in the bug filled buggy for too long when we got there. At the campground, we decided that we wanted to take a swim and cool off, so we gathered a bunch of towels and headed for the lake. We were three or four days out of Philadelphia, and in the buggy, we were standing there at the edge of the lake in the cover of dusk, listening for any mosquitoes that were about to pounce. I remember walking down to the lake and noticing that it wasn't real deep, like most of these lakes are deep in the summer. It was maybe a foot deep, and I looked around at the grass and the brush and the trees. Finally I stuck out my hand in the water to
