Q: RewriteRule works fine but it also caches the request, how to fix that? I have a URL like this: www.example.com/dir/directory and I want it to redirect to: www.example.com/dir/dir/directory to avoid duplicate content. So I added this rewrite rule: RewriteEngine On RewriteCond %{REQUEST_FILENAME}!-f RewriteCond %{REQUEST_FILENAME}!-d RewriteRule ^dir\/directory$ /dir/directory/ [L,R=301] It works fine when I request the URL directly through the browser, but when the request comes from a bot the URL is cached for some reason. Is there a way to prevent the URL from getting cached? A: The Nginx configuration explained here does not work for me. the outcome of the election, and is passed by congress. Up until the last campaign, Obama was in a virtual deadlock with McCain, in last month's presidential election. The last polls that were taken showed Obama winning by only 1 percent, with nearly a third of the votes undecided. What tipped the vote to Obama was the constant attack on McCain's integrity and character by Obama. However, the story of the course of the election is not as quickly decided as that of the election. For the course of the battle between two wars, many pieces fit, but many do not. In this, Obama is fortunate. The fact that he has mentioned Iraq at any time, much less twice, in a very long victory speech in Chicago, despite the strong opposition by the US Senate to even present the idea of a second war against Iraq, shows that the ending is a long time coming. The same is true of the war in Afghanistan. Obama has said the beginning is in a counterinsurgency phase, but the march toward combat troops has already begun. This may be long, but in the past the Democrat party thought that the US was a nation of great heart and its people would not countenance the use of force. That seems to be no longer the case. Most recent polls have shown that the war is unpopular, not only with the American people, but also the military. Even the military brass is in revolt against a war that is costing them $3.3 billion a week. There is almost nothing as impactful in the media in a campaign as when Obama refers to the war in Iraq. The third impact will be in the economic ramifications of a continued war. With the economy in such a dangerous place, Obama has chosen to focus on the economy, and not on the war. In many ways, he could be fighting on two fronts, one of which is the economy and the other of which is the war. What the House of Representatives will do is tell the President what kind of recovery package he should put together. No matter what happens now, and who wins, there is the eventual recognition that the war has to end. Few people have thought that the war in Iraq, which is now costing $3.3 billion a week, will soon end. The Senate's rejection of the so-called surge shows the war's unpopularity, as does Obama's utterance that his job is to
