In 2.4.5 there is the possibility to. the current layer by clicking on the button "LAYER. annotation and filling it with a color. . New features of the upcoming version 5: . Now you can use more than four color options of Chameleon's palette, and export the maps as tiled images. With version 4.4.x you could use the adaptive palette with the Classic API for Mac . Create a new palette in Photoshop. Now you have the possibility to create palettes ., you can merge the palettes by painting on the objects of one palette. The new version also includes some other enhancements. A: So, this is the ideal palette: So here's the process to achieve that palette: Go to Edit > Colors > Make Click Make Custom on the right hand side Make your selection to only pick the colors you want Click back to Make Custom again That's it, you're done. If you need more colors, just repeat this process Have fun! A: I believe this is a major pain. I use the following: I have two Master palettes. They are sequential so that for my biggest project I have 4 Master palettes. I make grays and black first to avoid having to make a ton of layers (I have all my grays from the grays menu). I just bring up the grays/black palettes and just move up through the layers until I'm happy with it. The one thing you should always make sure to is leave enough whitespace for the image when you are making a grayscale. I use a black and white image. I add a layer that has just black and white transparency. I make a color copy of the image. (I make the copy first to avoid adding a black/white transparency layer onto the black/white transparency layer) When I have all the colors that I need I swap out the images. I remember starting with no to many colors. I made enough color copies until they were right. If you are making grayscale make some black and white copies to avoid the black/white image. Just keep
