The present invention relates generally to hydroelectric power generation, and more particularly, to a hydroelectric power generation plant operating in conjunction with an existing water storage facility to generate additional electricity from water flow through the plant. 2. Background Waterwheels and other types of water power generators have been used for millennia to produce energy. In modern times, hydroelectric power generation is by far the most common form of electricity generation. Hydroelectric power generation uses the flow of water to turn a turbine that rotates a generator that produces electricity. In some plants, the water is diverted by means of a tunnel, flume, or other structure that gathers the water as it flows in a river, stream, lake, or other body of water. In other plants, a dam is constructed across a river, lake, or other body of water, with the dam effectively forming a conduit through which water may pass, including through turbines that are installed at strategic locations along the conduit. The placement of the turbines along the conduit is such that a desired amount of water will flow past the turbines at a given speed, thereby generating electricity. The flow of water through the conduit is timed in accordance with the rotation of a turbine shaft, which is connected to the generator. In addition to dams, other structures have been used to effect the diversion of water, such as a flume or tunnel. While such structures divert water in the same manner as a dam, they are used to divert water in one body of water to another. The
